The lawyers Dube, Manikai & Hwacha were responding to the lead story in The Standard story headlined: ED scheme hit by scandal, which was based on a High Court case. President Emmerson Mnangagwa is committed to respecting the two presidential term limits despite the push by some sections of Zanu PF for him to remain in power until 2030, his lawyers have said. The lawyers Dube, Manikai & Hwacha were responding to the lead story in The Standard story headlined: ED scheme hit by scandal, which was based on a High Court case. It was about a Harare man who took the municipality to the High Court after it allocated his stand for a presidential borehole scheme run by Mnangagwas special advisor Paul Tungwarara without his knowledge. The applicant, Chenjerai Milton Musonza, cited the City of Harare and the director of housing and community services as respondents. He said a community solar project covering his whole stand was erected and a borehole was drilled there, all without his knowledge. War veterans led by Blessed Geza on several occasions accused Tungwarara of using the presidential schemes to push the campaign, but the lawyers said the statements input subverting or by-passing the constitution, abuse of office and groups of people, including war veterans and their families. Our client has consistently affirmed, publicly and internationally his commitment to constitutionalism including the two term limit under Zimbabwean laws, the lawyers wrote to The Standard. Your portrayal seeks to justly undermine this commitment and create public doubt regarding his constitutional adherence. Mnangagwa has on more than five occasions insisted that he will retire when his second and final term expires, but Zanu PF has said it its pushing ahead with the implementation for the 2024 conference resolution for his term to be extended to 2030. The lawyers also demanded the retraction of an editorial comment published in the same edition calling for transparency in the disbursement of money from presidential funds run by Tungwarara. HelloCould you please tell me which of these options is the better: (1) standard English or (2) Standard English?Thank you No reason to capitalise standard. However Im not sure if there is such a thing as standard English. Capitalizing "Standard" seems to be more common and makes sense as well, since it is the proper name of a recognized dialect, not merely a descriptor of a dialect as being "standard." If "Standard English" is a recognised dialect, then I agree it would be better to capitalise it, like we usually capitalise things like Received Pronunciation and Early Modern English (these aren't dialects, but they are recognised forms of the English language). However, I would not use "standard English" in this way. Changes are happening so quickly that it is sometimes difficult to know what is standard and what isn't. If "Standard English" is a recognised dialect, then I agree it would be better to capitalise it, like we usually capitalise things like Received Pronunciation and Early Modern English (these aren't dialects, but they are recognised forms of the English language). However, I would not use "standard English" in this way. Changes are happening so quickly that it is sometimes difficult to know what is standard and what isn't. But the question isn't whether a truly "standard" variety actually exists but whether the existence and characteristics of something called "Standard English" are discussed, which is the case. It's without a capital for me: standard English, non-standard English. Not capitalizing "non-standard English" makes sense, because there you're only using "standard" as a descriptor. Likewise it makes sense not to capitalize it in a context like "there is no standard English." But there are many books written about "Standard English," which is a specific variety whose existence is at least postulated in the literature. Not capitalizing it makes no more sense than not capitalizing Nostratic, a language whose existence is likewise debated. HelloCould you please tell me which of these options is the better: (1) standard English or (2) Standard English?Thank you I would use Standard English. It's effectively a proper name, and both elements should be capitalised. If there is a recognized variety of English called Standard English, and leaving aside the question of whether or not there is one, I would capitalize it. Last edited: Nov 25, 2020 Well.... looking back through previous threads, there are certainly examples where those arguing for a capital S have used lower-case: here's one The original is grammatical within the dialect that the passage as a whole is written in. It's not the way we normally speak or write standard English. Last edited: Nov 25, 2020 (Now I'm off to find examples where I used a capital!)
