(Cab Calloway, common opening for his performances and in reference to his song "Minnie the Moocher")The word "hi" is a relatively newer addition to the English language compared to some other greetings. It essentially came from older words that people used to get someone's attention. Think of it this way: people have always had sounds they make to get someone to look their way or to acknowledge them. "Hi" is like a softened-down version of those older shouts. Its first known uses were around the 15th century in Middle English, often spelled as "hy" or "hey." At that time, its main meaning wasn't necessarily a friendly greeting as we know it today, but more of an exclamation to call attention. Imagine someone shouting "Hey!" across a field to get someone to turn around.It wasn't until much later, around 1862 in American English, that "hi" really started being recorded as the informal greeting we use all the time now. So, while its roots are in a simple attention-getting sound, it evolved over centuries to become the friendly, casual "hello" we use every day. Here's a list of phrases and idioms using "hi," supplemented with lesser-known ones and those using synonyms for similar effect.Hi-def (or Hi-definition): Referring to high definition, especially in electronics and media.Hi-fi (or Hi-fidelity): Referring to high fidelity, particularly in audio equipment.Hi-lo: A term indicating a varying or alternating level, from high to low.Hi-tech (or High-tech): Referring to high technology.Give a hi-five: To slap palms together as a gesture of greeting, celebration, or agreement.Hi-ho: An exclamation often used to express cheerfulness or as a call to action (as in "Hi-ho, silver!").Wave hi: To wave one's hand as a greeting.Say hi: To offer a greeting.Big hello: An enthusiastic greeting (using a synonym for "hi").Shout a greeting: To call out a hello loudly.
